It is not so very many years ago that some men of science argued that no one had ever reached the age of 100, and that the stories of Old Parr were all robbish. Nowadays no one thinks of questioning the age of centenarians, for the registers attest it only too clearly, and it is no longer necessary to write a book to prove that mankind can live to 100, even without the aid of the Bulgarian bacilins. The reason for the increasing numher of centenarians is to be found in tile great advance of hygiene and sanitation, and perhaps even more to the fact that we do not eat and drink our selves into our graver. Moderation in cating and drinking is with the vast majority the feature of modern life.
